

GOVERNMENT CONTRACT FRAUD

Fraud in federal and state government contracts occurs in many different forms and affects numerous government agencies and industries. The consequences of government contract fraud can be extremely significant – from substantial waste of tax dollars to the harm caused by compromised national security, endangerment to members of the military, or fault in government construction and procured products.

Common types of fraudulent activities include:

Cross-Charging - Cross-charging schemes occur where a government contractor charges one government contract for the costs, labor, materials and other fees incurred in the performance of a different contract. Cross-charging schemes frequently involve contractors shifting costs from a “fixed-price” contract to a “cost-plus” contract.

Improper Cost Allocation - Improper cost allocation occurs when a government contractor fraudulently shifts costs that are unrelated to a particular government contract (for example, overhead costs from unrelated private sector work) to the government through a government contract.

Violations of the Truth in Negotiations Act (TINA) - When the government purchases products or services which require complex technology or other specialization (especially weaponry or military equipment), there may be only one company (sole source) with the ability to satisfy the government’s contractual needs. The Truth in Negotiations Act (TINA) protects the government from being overcharged in the negotiation of sole source and other contracts by requiring that contractors make certain disclosures including accurate, current, and correct cost and pricing information. Contractors who falsify these disclosures may be subject to FCA liability.

Bribery, Bid-Rigging and Kickbacks - Government contractors are prohibited from colluding with each other on bids, providing kickbacks in order to gain an unfair advantage in the bidding process, and accepting bribes/kickbacks – such as from a subcontractor.

Improper Product Substitution - Government contracts often contain specific requirements with regard to the type, quality or grade of parts to be used under the contract. Government contractors may seek to reap undue profits by substituting a less expensive or otherwise inferior part or product without the government’s permission.

Failure to Comply with Specification - Just as government contracts often contain specific requirements about the quality or grade of parts, government contracts may also include very detailed product specifications. Specifications could include: required quality assurance steps or other kinds of testing, design specifications, or certain temperatures or conditions the product needs to be able to withstand. A contractor's decision to cut corners or otherwise disregard specifications may form the basis of a False Claims Act case.

Government Contractor Wage Fraud - The Davis Bacon Act requires that government contractors and subcontractors on public works and construction projects pay their employees the prevailing wage rate. These contractors must also submit payroll certifications vouching for the appropriate payment of all workers on the project. Contractors have been held liable for falsifying these certifications, or submitting them without actually checking that proper payment was made.

Retaining Rebates/Discounts - Where a government contractor is providing the government with supplies procured from other companies, the government contractor may receive discounts or rebates. Many government contracts require the contractor to pass all discounts or rebates to the government customer. Successful enforcement actions have been brought against contractors who fail to provide rebates and discounts to the government.

If you would like to speak to one of our attorneys about a potential whistleblower matter, please email us at wbinfo@ktmc.com or call us at (610) 667-7706. All case evaluations are confidential and free.